BARBRA STREISAND WEARS QUARTER MILLION IN FUR STYLES

A $250,000 group of fur stylings, believed to be the most expensive set of clothes ever designed for one-time use by one person, will be seen by the nation's television viewers late this month.

The collection of five individually styled outfits will be worn by Barbra Streisand in her first television special, "My Name Is Barbra," to be broadcast Wednesday, April 28 (9:00-10:00 PM, EDT) on the CBS Television Network. The wardrobe was created for Miss Streisand by Emeric Partos, famed fur designer for Bergdorf Goodman in New York. It will be worn by the star in a production number that was taped on location in that haute couture store.

Partos, Hungarian-born and one-time assistant to the late Christian Dior, is known to the fashion world as the designer "who drapes furs like silks." For Miss Streisand's collection, he worked with mink (white and brown varieties), white broadtail and leopard.

"Before we can talk about the clothes," said Partos, who was interviewed in his eighth floor Bergdorf Goodman atelier overlooking Central Park, "we must first talk about the person.

"Miss Streisand is an extraordinary girl, not at all what I expected," he commented. "She is a young woman with an extraordinary conception of clothes. Her judgment is surprisingly good, indeed. I would go so far as to say excellent. Perhaps her only fault is that everything she sees, she likes."

Then, spreading his hands, he smiled and said, "This, of course, is a fault she will outgrow. After all, one can not escape the fact that she is still very young."

Miss Streisand will celebrate her 23rd birthday on April 24.

Partos reached over to his desk, burrowed through a mass of papers and pulled out a sketch.

"I must explain to you," he said, "that I do not design in the ordinary manner. Many designers work directly and completely with their sketches. My sketches are only preliminaries, working sketches of an idea. I drape the canvas of the fur design with which I am working on a dummy shaped to the proportions of the customer and see how it falls. My corrections and changes are not made in sketches, they're made with the material.

"Now, this is a sketch for the broadtail riding habit (see accompanying illustration)," Partos continued. "Barbra liked the essential concept, but then she became involved in a fantastic number of details which only confused the issue. As a matter of fact, she devoted more time to the details than to the jacket itself."

Miss Streisand's preoccupation with such details reflected her lively intellect and inherent good taste. But with two strong viewpoints, it was inevitable that there be some animated discussions.

"For instance, we decided to put a bib here," Partos said, pointing to the throat area. "This decision brought on a series of discussions as to whether it should be made of lace or satin, whether it should be a tie. I knew all along that it would have to be lace, so I went along and let her get it out of her system.

"On the other hand," Partos added, "this was the first sketch (see illustration) of what eventually became a blue and brown paisley jump suit with an accompanying paisley coat lined with ranch mink. I was absolutely amazed -- no discussion of detail. It was love at first sight."

Partos spent six weeks in all in creating the designs for the five outfits. It took another month to produce them. The shortness of time might have disturbed other designers, but challenges seem to stimulate Partos. In a career that extends back more than three decades, he has changed his area of specialization three times, something rarely done in the world of fashion.

"For 10 years I designed nothing but dresses," he explains. "Then for another dozen I did coats and suits. Now, for the last dozen years I have been designing in furs. This is the greatest challenge of all. To make a truly beautiful creation in fur is like building a beautiful house."

There are those who say Partos has blazed new trails in the fashion uses for fur, but he is the first to disclaim the plaudit.

"You see, many fur designers create as if furs were cumbersome," he says. "My designs reflect my earlier years. I still work as if I am designing dresses or suits. There really is nothing new under the sun in fashion. Everything that could be done, has been done. Now, it's simply a matter of the way in which it's done."

Partos' "way" will be revealed to millions of viewers on the evening of April 28 when Barbra Streisand wears the fabulous $250,000 wardrobe created specifically for her.
