

HOME OF EMERIC PARTOS

Hungarian-born furrier Emeric Partos has decorated his home with many influences.

To the left of the entrance is a Victorian powder room walled in deep red felt, the perfect setting for two Louis Phillipe chairs.

Currier & Ives prints and an 18th century American pettipoint of a Turk line the foyer walls.

The lovely warm living-dining area is a comfortable room filled with English and American 17th and 18th century furnishings. The emphasis is on American craftsmanship. To give honest background for the country pieces, the fireplace and paneling in this room have been copied from an old New England home reproduced in the American Wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

American, English and German pewter, and an unusual piece reflecting the Chinese influence, are displayed throughout. Pewter soldiers' bowls lend themselves to the gay place settings at the country table. Crewel curtains frame the colored glass collection on the window sill.

Three American primitive paintings hang over the couch. The coffee table is an old chest. On the wall to the left of the couch is an arrangement of mounted wax figures. This corner bears close examination for its examples of colonial ingenuity and early American whimsy.

The rug is Persian. To the right of the fireplace with its copper andirons, is a New England hutch c. 1740 placed over a table for use as a secretary. By it sits an amusing old bird-cage.

An 18th century English bar and a collection of blue Staffordshire featuring American historical scenes are found in the small area adjacent to the main room.

In his bedroom and the upstairs parlor, Mr. Partos reveals his love for France where he lived and studied. The rooms echo the classical elegance of the 19th century. The awesome empire bed and the matched armchairs are attributed to Jacob Desmalter, cabinet maker to Napoleon. The bar is English regency; the handsome couch, directoire. The open armchair before the fireplace is similar to one in the Red Room of the White House. Grecian prints and marble wall plaques of antiquity's heroes hang over the bed.

The sitting room walls are covered with green cloth. The window draperies are bordered with fine French brocade rescued from a shop in Paris. Louis XVIII is the predominant influence in this room. The table by the window is papier mache. The pettipoint represents Napoleon at Austwitz. The bar is Georgian.
